John Armstrong began his career in 1994 as a packaging engineer with Dresser-Rand and transitioned to its worldwide operations group to oversee its capital projects and provide technical support to various operational teams in South America, developing expertise in various midstream facility applications including high pressure (5,000 to 10,000 psig) for enhanced oil recovery. John completed his stint in South America while at Williams in its international business unit delivering capital projects and operational support for its Venezuelan assets while also serving as a technical contributor to its international commercial business development team.

In 2003, John joined Enserca serving in both business development and project management capacities delivering major capital project solutions (facility and pipeline) for various midstream organizations. John then transitioned in late 2005 to serve as Managing Partner for ERM Pipeline and formed a joint venture with Enogex, Inc. (unregulated subsidiary of OGE) developing midstream assets in the Rocky Mountain region including Twin Basin Gathering System designed to connect the Uinta and Piceance basins.

John left ERM Pipeline in mid-2008 to lead Enserca deploying “lean” manufacturing strategies in the development of process equipment and gas plants providing products for organizations such as MarkWest and Costar Midstream as well as formulating innovative turnkey pipeline solutions for major capital projects such as the Tesoro Uinta Express Pipeline.

As a result, John has more than twenty years of experience in the development, execution, and operation of midstream infrastructure related to more than 500 miles of pipeline and 75 facilities with expertise in asset development, contract negotiations, program management, team formation, management, engineering and design, process development and implementation, as well as leading organizational and back office infrastructure.

John received a B.S. in Mechanical Engineering from the University of Tulsa in 1997, attended the Executive MBA program at Daniels College of Business in 2008, and collaborated with the University of Denver through 2014 to develop and implement an in-house professional development program focused on leadership, management, and communication. John enjoys giving back to the community in various capacities including teaching International Business Strategy as a part of the graduate program at the Colorado School of Mines.
